- Supporters of public charter schools say that students who live in neighborhoods with under-performing public schools that don't prepare them for life after high school deserve better. Parents have waited too long for public schools to improve and deserve choices so their children have access to a high-quality education.
- Opponents say public charter schools divert needed funding from public schools, while cherry-picking their best students. They say the expansion of charter schools is an attempt by billionaires like Eli Broad to privatize schools, undermine teachers unions and dismantle the public school system. They say we should focus on improving under-performing schools rather than giving up on them.
